

DIVINE PERSONS IN GENESIS: THEOLOGICAL IMPLICATIONS

by
William D. Barrick<sup>1</sup>

Beginning with its third word, the book of Genesis reveals that God (אֱלֹהִים) exists and that he created the heavens and the earth. The seventeenth word from the end of the book is also “God” (אֱלֹהִים)—in Joseph’s declaration that God will provide for the descendants of his father Israel. Few exegetes would argue today that the plural form of אֱלֹהִים even implies a plurality of divine persons—and rightly so. However, evidence exists within the text of the first book of Moses that might indicate a distinction of persons in the Godhead. For example, both Genesis 1:2 and 6:3 seem to refer to the Spirit of God. Other statements in the text of Genesis appear to mention more than one divine person named Yahweh (19:24). Some references involve a person identified as the “angel/messenger of Yahweh” (e.g., 22:11). Was this individual the same as one of the “three men” who appeared to Abraham (18:2) and before whom Abraham stood (18:22)? Is he a person of the Godhead?

In addition to these more direct and perhaps less abstract references to a divine person, Genesis includes several first person plural statements (“us” and “our”) spoken by a divine person (1:26; 3:22; 11:7). Are these references best explained as multiple divine persons, some sort of plural of majesty, or some council of spirit beings other than divine? What is the exegetical evidence? What are the implications theologically regarding either a plurality of divine persons or even a limitation to three such divine persons? Furthermore, how do these implications affect the way we understand ancient human conceptions of God, his person, his attributes, and his work from Adam to Joseph?

INTRODUCTION

This study begins by looking at some general principles with which to approach the topic of the Trinity in the OT generally. First, we must recognize that the revelation God provides in the OT represents the early stages of progressive revelation completed by the NT. At each stage of revelatory development the biblical text clarifies and expands theological truths. Second, the wisest course of interpretive analysis attempts to interpret the biblical text with its chronological development in mind.<sup>2</sup> In other words, we need to avoid imposing Isaiah upon the interpretation of Genesis or the NT upon the interpretation of Isaiah. Third, each text must stand by itself in its own context. What did the original writer intend and how did the original recipients understand it?

---

<sup>1</sup>Dr. Barrick, long-time professor of Old Testament at the Master’s Seminary (Sun Valley, CA) continues to serve there as a Faculty Associate in his (semi-)retirement. This article was previously presented at the national meeting of the Evangelical Theological Society in San Antonio, TX (November 15, 2016).

John Feinberg suggests that we need not “lose anything of significance to the doctrine of the Trinity”<sup>3</sup> in the OT. In fact, he concludes that “the observant OT saint” could have observed clues in the OT texts that indicated “that there is more to say about God than just that there is one God and Yahweh is his name.”<sup>4</sup>

Although a plurality within the Godhead might be implied by the OT, that does not mean that the OT believer would ever speak of a triune God, nor would he formulate the plurality as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit per se. One note of caution, however—I am not saying that no OT believer ever referred to God as Father (cf. Ps 89:26; Isa 63:16; 64:8; Jer 3:19; Mal 2:10) or as Son (cf. Ps 2:7, 12; Prov 30:4) or as Holy Spirit (cf. Ps 51:11; Isa 63:10, 11).<sup>5</sup> The individual titles might well be found somewhere within the OT’s progressive revelation, but the three are never put together the way they are in Matthew 28:19, for example. Likewise, I am not saying that no OT text ever speaks of multiple persons by means of differentiating divine titles.

Some theologians express extreme skepticism regarding any concept of the Trinity in the OT and even question its existence in the Gospel narratives.<sup>6</sup> A popular pamphlet on the Trinity only refers to <sup>2</sup>Interpretation of any biblical text “must be carefully controlled diachronically (i.e., we must ever be aware of the various time periods in the sequence of the progress of revelation” (Walter C. Kaiser, Jr., Toward an Exegetical Theology [Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981], 136). That does not mean, however, that we ignore subsequent revelation, because it can help us to better understand a prior revelation. As Darrell L. Bock explains, “it is important to state that when appealing to the whole of Scripture an awareness of what is antecedent to the given passage and what is subsequent must be maintained” (“Evangelicals and the Use of the Old Testament in the New,” Bibliotheca Sacra 142 [Oct 1985]: 310, emphasis his). But, the interpreter could also consider that subsequent revelation can clarify “what God was ultimately pointing toward” (ibid., 310, n. 10).

---

<sup>3</sup>John S. Feinberg, No One Like Him: The Doctrine of God, Foundations of Evangelical Theology (Wheaton, IL: Crossway, 2001), 445.

<sup>4</sup>Ibid.

<sup>5</sup>Such texts, being outside Genesis, will not be analyzed in this paper. For sympathetic statements about these texts, see Feinberg, No One Like Him, 451–56. It must be noted, however, that theologians sold out to higher criticism and the Documentary Hypothesis deny any concept of divine plurality in the OT, since they normally date Gen 1 to at least the sixth century B.C., a time parallel with the so-called Deutero-Isaiah. See Walter Brueggemann, Genesis, Interpretation (1982; repr., Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2010), 24–25.

<sup>6</sup>E.g., R. W. L. Moberly writes, “A trinitarian theology must remember always to keep the Old Testament and gospel narratives in the foreground. Trinitarian theology

OT texts to demonstrate the deity of Christ, but provides no indication at all that the OT itself testifies clearly to a plurality of persons in the Godhead.<sup>7</sup> Have they correctly understood the biblical witness? Scripture alone contains the revelation of the doctrine of the Trinity—natural revelation provides no key or clue to this major article of Christian faith. Perhaps Chafer’s observation summarizes the reason why some theologians fail to see the Trinity in the OT: “No argument has been advanced against the Trinitarian conception other than that it does not conform to the limitations of the mind of man.”<sup>8</sup> In other words, rejection of the Trinity in the OT stems from the fact that some theologians have difficulty allowing the writers of the OT (within their supposedly very primitive ANE environment) the ability to write of sophisticated theological concepts supposedly originating with Christianity in the NT. Usually, these theologians buttress their line of reasoning with constant appeals to a history of religion and to a documentary view of multiple editors for individual books of the OT.<sup>9</sup>

FROM THE BEGINNING

Genesis 1:1–2 speaks of more than just the act of creation. The text identifies the Creator as “God” and immediately thereafter indicates the possibility of another person of the Godhead at work: “The Spirit of God hovered over the surface of the waters.” The phrase “Spirit of God” (רוּחַ אֱלֹהִים) occurs only fifteen times in the Hebrew Bible and appears always to be a reference to a person, not a wind. In addition, אֱלֹהִים never occurs as an adjective in the creation account—it always refers to God.<sup>10</sup> The evidence is so overwhelming that Hildebrandt always tends to locate in eternity that which was achieved in time” (The Bible, Theology, and Faith: A Study of Abraham and Jesus, Cambridge Studies in Christian Doctrine [Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2000], 236). Although Broughton Knox believes that the Gospels do reveal the Trinity, he is convinced that the doctrine of the Trinity “arose from the Christian experience of God in Jesus Christ and which was taught indeed by Christ himself” (The Everlasting God [Kingsford, Australia: Matthias Media, 2009], 67). In other words, Knox seems to deny that the OT reveals any plurality of divine Persons.

---

<sup>7</sup>Robert M. Bowman, Jr., et al., The Trinity (Torrance, CA: Rose, 1999).

<sup>8</sup>Lewis Sperry Chafer, Systematic Theology, 8 vols. (1947; repr., Dallas: Dallas Seminary Press, 1969), 1:274.

<sup>9</sup>Examples of this mode of thinking can be seen in extensive entries on רוּחַ (rûah, “S/spirit”) in the less evangelical theological dictionaries: S. Tengström and H.-J. Fabry, “רוּחַ rûah,” in Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament, 16 vols., ed. G. Johannes Botterweck, Helmer Ringgren, and Heinz-Josef Fabry, trans. David E. Green (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004), 13:365–402; R. Albertz and C. Westermann, “רוּחַ rûah spirit,” in Theological Lexicon of the Old Testament, 3 vols., ed. Ernst Jenni and Claus Westermann, trans. Mark E. Biddle (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997), 3:1202–20.

<sup>10</sup>See Bruce K. Waltke, Genesis, with Cathi J. Fredricks (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2001), 60 (he also takes 6:3 as a reference to the Spirit of God as person; ibid., 117), and Wilf Hildebrandt, An Old Testament Theology of the Spirit of God (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995), 18.

reaches a conclusion commensurate with that of Moltmann regarding the personhood of the Spirit of God: “The personhood of God the Holy Spirit is the loving, self-communicating, out-fanning and out-pouring presence of the eternal divine life of the triune God.”<sup>11</sup> However, Hildebrandt then warns that taking this too far might lead to “speculative intrusion into the OT references,” since the full development of the personhood of the Spirit of God awaits the NT revelation.<sup>12</sup> This hesitation to make the commitment to seeing a divine person as “the Spirit of God” in the second verse of Genesis arises even among some of the strongest evangelical theologians. Merrill, for example, concludes that “The Spirit is to be understood here as an effect of God and not yet, as in New Testament and Christian theology, the third Person of the triune Godhead.”<sup>13</sup>

Why the disagreements and even the hesitation to identify “the Spirit of God” in Genesis 1:2 as a person of the Godhead? Part of the resistance comes from the thinking that the interpreter must give due recognition to the ANE setting for the writing of Genesis and its creation account.<sup>14</sup> Is that how we must read Genesis? Must we limit ourselves to the way that pagan, unbelieving, idolatrous ANE cultures viewed God (or, gods)? To yield to this hermeneutic requires one to degrade and even destroy the significant difference between genuine believers in the true God and those who ridicule them for their faith. Their worldviews are (and were) very different. Their value systems are opposed. A rough equivalent in our own day would be to insist that future readers of evangelical books should read them as though evangelicals have adopted the prevailing worldview or Zeitgeist—that our theology and morality actually coincide with non-Christian philosophy and (im)morality in the twenty-first century. If we would scream, “Foul!” so would the OT writers. Many who write as Hildebrandt does only intend that we recognize that the OT writers are reacting to and interacting with the unbelieving culture of their day, not adopting the beliefs expressed by pagan myths. However, it does not always come out sounding or smelling that way, especially when someone insists that there is no way that “the Spirit of God” in Genesis 1:2 could be a person of the Godhead, because such a concept was totally foreign to the ANE cultures among whom the Hebrew writers dwelt.

One must also look at Genesis 6:3 where God refers to “my Spirit.” Hildebrandt’s treatment of this text detours into later revelation before <sup>11</sup>J. Moltmann, The Spirit of Life: A Universal Affirmation, trans. M. Kohl (London: SCM, 1992), 289, cited by Hildebrandt, Old Testament Theology of the Spirit of God, 90. Gordon J. Wenham agrees even while adopting the translation “the Wind of God” as a concrete and vivid image of the Spirit of God” (Genesis 1–15, Word Biblical Commentary [Waco, TX: Word, 1987], 17).

---

<sup>12</sup>Hildebrandt, Old Testament Theology of the Spirit of God, 90.

<sup>13</sup>Eugene H. Merrill, Everlasting Dominion: A Theology of the Old Testament (Nashville: B&H, 2006), 102–3.

<sup>14</sup>Hildebrandt, Old Testament Theology of the Spirit of God, 3.

reaching a conclusion. He seeks to place the reference in a context of divine judgment as expressed throughout the OT. He still comes to a result identifying the Spirit as a personal being, but not as independently as the decision he made in 1:2.<sup>15</sup>

PLURAL NOUNS AND PRONOUNS

The Hebrew אֱלֹהִים does not suffice as proof of the Trinity. The same noun can be used of pagan gods like Baal and Ashtoreth (cf. Judg 8:33; 1 Kgs 11:5; 2 Kgs 1:3)—we would resist considering such plurals an indication of a trinitarian plurality of persons within Ashtoreth or Baal. The Hebrew text normally uses singular verbs and adjectives with אֱלֹהִים in reference to the one true God (e.g., Gen 1:1). It is so characteristic that any departure from that practice stands out as unusual and in need of careful evaluation. Therefore, passages such as Genesis 20:13 and 35:7 might benefit from a closer look due to their use of a plural verb with אֱלֹהִים.<sup>16</sup>

Theologians and exegetes can build a weightier case by examining the use of plural pronouns together with the identifications of distinct persons in the Godhead. Three passages using first person plurals punctuate the Genesis accounts of the creation, fall, and distribution of mankind on the earth (1:26; 3:22; 11:7). Whether these plurals are taken as plurals of majesty, plurals of self-address (deliberation<sup>17</sup>), potentially<sup>18</sup> Trinitarian plurals, or references to a council of spirit beings, the references draw attention to the significance of the events with which

---

<sup>15</sup>Ibid., 83–91. Unfortunately Kenneth A. Mathews fails to identify which view he himself prefers out of the three views he describes (Genesis 1–11:26, New American Commentary [Nashville: B&H, 1996], 332–33). Wenham understands 6:3 as a reference to “the life-giving power of God.... It is called the ‘breath of life’ (2:7) or ‘the spirit of life’ (6:17; 7:15)” (Genesis 1–15, 141). Wenham’s view agrees with that of Claus Westermann, Genesis 1–11, trans. John J. Scullion, Continental Commentary (1984; repr., Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1990), 374.

<sup>16</sup>Feinberg, No One Like Him, 449. See Gordon J. Wenham for explanations not contributing to any view of the plurality of persons in the Godhead (Genesis 16–50, Word Biblical Commentary [Dallas: Word, 1994], 73, 321). Michael S. Heiser identifies only six such occurrences in the Hebrew Bible (“Should אֱלֹהִים [‘ēlōhīm] with Plural Predication Be Translated ‘Gods?’” Bible Translator 61 [July 2010]: 124), although in the article he adds a seventh, Gen 31:53 (ibid., 133). Heiser concludes that such plural verbs with אֱלֹהִים probably could be taken as references to a divine council (ibid., 136). The matter involves more than can be presented in the current paper and does not promise to have any significant bearing on the question of a plurality of persons in the Godhead.

<sup>17</sup>William David Reybourn and Euan McG. Fry explain that this involves a speaker “conferring or consulting with himself” (A Handbook on Genesis, UBS Handbook Series [New York: United Bible Societies, 1998], 50).

<sup>18</sup>In accord with my introductory comments, it behooves the interpreter to treat these references as potential implications of plurality, not as any specifically Trinitarian statements.

the text associates them.<sup>19</sup> These three texts mark notable events pertinent to a proper theological understanding of who God is, what deeds God has performed (both in creation and in setting about to redeem fallen mankind), who man is, and what man has caused by his disobedience to his Creator. Such plural pronouns occur one time outside Genesis (Isa 6:8, “Then I heard the voice of the Lord saying, ‘Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?’”). In my opinion, these OT occurrences might be favorably compared with the use of the first person plural in NT passages like John 14:23, “Jesus answered and said to him, ‘If anyone love Me, he will keep My word; and My Father will love him, and We will come to him and make Our abode with him’” (emphasis mine). It might be argued that Jesus purposefully echoes the language of the three Genesis texts to highlight his own deity.

Genesis 1:26

Commentators and theologians have proposed as many as eight different views of the plural pronouns (“us...our...our”) in this text:<sup>20</sup>

- (1) a remnant from a polytheistic account without correcting it<sup>21</sup>
- (2) a reference to God plus the heavens and the earth<sup>22</sup>

---

<sup>19</sup>S. R. Driver remarks that God adopts “this unusual and significant mode of expression” in order to introduce the account of man’s creation with solemnity (The Book of Genesis, with Introduction and Notes [New York: Edwin S. Gorham, 1904], 14). Bill T. Arnold agrees that the “lofty words of v. 26 make this event distinctive” (Genesis, New Century Bible Commentary (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2009), 44). John Peter Lange lists five different ways to understand these first person plurals, but concludes that the carrying of the plural into “our image” might more accurately point to “a distinction in the divine personality” (Genesis or, the First Book of Moses, trans. Tayler Lewis and A. Gosman [1864; electronic ed., Bellingham, WA: Logos Bible Software, 2008], 173). Hebraists point out that the so-called “plural of majesty” applies primarily to nouns and that it is uncertain whether that applies also to plural verbs or pronouns (cf. James McKeown, Genesis, Two Horizons Old Testament Commentary [Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008], 26; Paul Joüon, A Grammar of Biblical Hebrew, trans. and rev. T. Muraoka, 2 vols., Subsidia Biblica 14/I–II [Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1993] 2:376 [§114e, n. 1]).

<sup>20</sup>Victor P. Hamilton, The Book of Genesis Chapters 1–17, New International Commentary on the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990), 133–34; C. John Collins, Genesis 1–4: A Linguistic, Literary, and Theological Commentary (Phillipsburg, NJ: P&R, 2006), 59–61. R. R. Reno discusses only the matter of what the “image” is, nothing about the plural pronouns (Genesis, Brazos Theological Commentary on the Bible [Grand Rapids: Brazos, 2010], 51–53).

<sup>21</sup>Herman Gunkel, Genesis, Handcommentar zum Alten Testament 1/1, 6th ed. (Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1963), 111; George A. F. Knight attributes this to a henotheistic—one among many—view of God at the time of the J document of the Pentateuch (A Christian Theology of the Old Testament, Biblical and Theological Classics Library [1959; repr., Carlisle, UK: Paternoster, 1998], 12–13).

<sup>22</sup>W. Caspari, “Imago Divina,” in Festschrift Reihold Seeberg, ed. W. Koepf (Leipzig, Germany: A. Deichert, 1929), 1:207; Waltke, Genesis, 64–65 (arguing that 3:22 and 11:7 do not appear to be a plurality in the Godhead either). Mathews points out that v. 27 (“God created man”) contradicts this view—God alone is the Creator (Genesis 1–11:26, 161).

- (3) a reference to the angelic beings in heaven's court—the most popular view currently and one that groups all such occurrences into the same category (Gen 1:26; 3:22; 11:7; Isa 6:8).<sup>23</sup>
- (4) a plural pronoun used when addressing oneself—a plural of deliberation:<sup>24</sup> Collins believes that this opens the possibility of referring to a plurality of persons in the Godhead.<sup>25</sup> However, Mathews finds this viewpoint lacking because there is no evidence that the plural is used this way in Hebrew.<sup>26</sup> In fact, being cognizant of such absence of evidence, Cassuto adopts “the plural of exhortation,” even though that explanation is “rejected by the majority of contemporary commentators.”<sup>27</sup>
- (5) a plural pronoun of “majesty”—a royal “we”:<sup>28</sup> McKeown remarks that Hebrew nouns might be used this way, but there is insufficient evidence for pronouns and verbs with this sense in Biblical Hebrew.<sup>29</sup> Likewise, Payne says that “The so-called ‘royal we’ usage is foreign to Old Testament thought.”<sup>30</sup> Hebraists point out that the so-called “plural of majesty” applies primarily to nouns and that it is uncertain whether that applies also to plural verbs or pronouns.<sup>31</sup> Mathews argues that this

---

<sup>23</sup>See Bruce K. Waltke, An Old Testament Theology: An Exegetical, Canonical, and Thematic Approach, with Charles Yu (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2007), 212–15; Wenham, Genesis 1–15, 27–28, 85, 241; Patrick D. Miller, Jr., Genesis 1–11: Studies in Structure and Theme, Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series 8 (Sheffield, UK: University of Sheffield, 1978), 9–26.

<sup>24</sup>Westermann represents this view (Genesis 1–11, 145), as does GKC, 398 (§124g, n. 2). Thomas A. Keiser points out that this view suffers by finding very few analogies in Hebrew syntax and by its possible examples being questionable (“The Divine Plural: A Literary-Contextual Argument for Plurality in the Godhead,” Journal for the Study of the Old Testament 34 [2009]: 131–46).

<sup>25</sup>Collins, Genesis 1–4, 59.

<sup>26</sup>Mathews, Genesis 1–11:26, 161.

<sup>27</sup>U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Genesis—Part I: From Adam to Noah, Genesis I–VI 8, trans. Israel Abrahams (1961; repr., Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 1998), 55.

<sup>28</sup>Although many commentators and grammarians mention and respond to this view, none seems to supply an actual adherent—and such are hard to find, but they do exist. For example, “The ‘us’ of Gen. 1:26, therefore, is properly understood of plural majesty, as indicating the dignity and majesty of the speaker” (William Evans, The Great Doctrines of the Bible, enlarged ed., rev. S. Maxwell Coder [Chicago: Moody Press, 1974], 27). E. A. Speiser says of v. 26, “God refers to himself, which may account for the more formal construction in the plural” (Genesis: Introduction, Translation, and Notes, Anchor Bible Commentary [1974; reprint, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2008], 7). Later, at 11:7, however, Speiser says the plural pronoun “may be a plural of majesty” and also refers to 1:26 (ibid., 75).

<sup>29</sup>McKeown, Genesis, 16.

<sup>30</sup>J. Barton Payne, The Theology of the Older Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962), 167.

<sup>31</sup>Joüon, Grammar of Biblical Hebrew, 2:376 (§114e n. 1).

view “is flawed since the point of the verse is the unique correspondence between God and man, not the majesty of God.”<sup>32</sup>

(6) a plural of fullness<sup>33</sup>

(7) a duality (I-Thou) in the Godhead<sup>34</sup>

(8) a plurality of divine persons = potential Trinitarian reference<sup>35</sup>

One’s theological view of Scripture impacts how he might approach this problem and seek a solution. For someone who believes that a human being wrote Genesis 1 without any divine revelation, the text might explain the origin of mankind only from the author’s worldview. However, if the interpreter believes that Scripture’s primary author is God himself and that the record presents an accurate account from the Creator’s perspective, then the words fall within a totally different kind of context.<sup>36</sup> Indeed, since no man was present to hear these words when they were spoken, they can only be accurate if God himself revealed them to the human author after the fact. Like Merrill, I affirm the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch and the conviction that God gave Moses revelation with regard to what he recorded.<sup>37</sup>

The heavenly council viewpoint depends heavily upon extrabiblical references in ANE literature to a council of heavenly beings. In other words, as Keiser notes, this approaches the issue from outside the immediate biblical context.<sup>38</sup> According to Collins, some Bible scholars view any Trinitarian reference to be “ill-suited to the Old Testament or anachronistic.”<sup>39</sup> However, Collins points to five arguments that support a plurality of persons in the Godhead: (1) Genesis 1:27 declares that God created the man “in the image of God”—a limited reference

<sup>32</sup>Mathews, Genesis 1–11:26, 161.

<sup>33</sup>G. Hasel, “The Meaning of ‘Let Us’ in Gn 1:26,” Andrews University Seminary Studies 13 (1975): 58–66.

<sup>34</sup>Karl Barth, The Doctrine of Creation, trans. J. W. Edwards, O. Bussey, and Harold Knight, Church Dogmatics (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1958), 60.

<sup>35</sup>William Henry Green, A Hebrew Chrestomathy, or Lessons in Reading and Writing Hebrew (New York: John Wiley & Son, 1882), 84; Anthony A. Hoekema, Created in God’s Image (1986; repr., Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), 12; Paul R. House, Old Testament Theology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1998), 62; Bryan Murphy, “The Trinity in Creation,” Master’s Seminary Journal 24 (Fall 2013): 167–77.

<sup>36</sup>This is essentially the argument that Hoekema makes in regard to the accuracy of Moses’s account of what happened at the Fall in Gen 3 (Created in God’s Image, 126).

<sup>37</sup>Eugene H. Merrill, “A Theology of the Pentateuch,” in A Biblical Theology of the Old Testament, ed. Roy B. Zuck (Chicago: Moody Press, 1991), 8.

<sup>38</sup>“That is, not finding any clue within the Genesis account to indicate the referent, those who hold this position take recourse to something which was likely sufficiently prominent in the world view of the original author and reader that it would be unnecessary to provide an explicit clarification” (Keiser, “The Divine Plural,” 134).

<sup>39</sup>Collins, Genesis 1–4, 60.

omitting any indication of anyone outside the Godhead;<sup>40</sup> (2) the verbs “create” and “make” throughout the Creation account take God alone as their subject; (3) a parallel usage of the first person plural pronoun with regard to God occurs in Genesis 11:7 together with 11:8 identifying God alone as the actor; (4) inserting a council of angels does not fit well with other biblical references to such a council; and (5) a plurality of divine persons can be seen already with the reference to the Spirit of God in Genesis 1:2.<sup>41</sup> Yet, instead of accepting the plurality of persons in the Godhead as the author’s intended meaning, Collins prefers to limit it to sensus plenior which makes it possible to use 1:26 as a text that allows for the Trinity.<sup>42</sup>

Cassuto argues against the popular angelic council interpretation by also pointing to the text focusing on God alone as the Creator of mankind. Then he reasons that “Let us make” cannot be understood as consultation, because “if the intention was to tell us that God took counsel, the Bible would have explicitly stated whom he consulted, as we are told in other passages that are usually cited in support of this theory (I Kings xxii 19; Isa. vi 2–8; Job i–ii).”<sup>43</sup>

After disavowing the heavenly council of angels view, Mathews concludes that Genesis 1:26 (“our image”) together with v. 27 (“his image”) implies both the plurality (most immediately by reference to the Spirit of God in v. 2) and the unity of God.<sup>44</sup> This is basically the same position as Hamilton’s, who concludes his thought with the following cautionary statement:

It is one thing to say that the author of Gen. 1 was not schooled in the intricacies of Christian dogma. It is another thing to say he was theologically too primitive or naive [sic] to handle such ideas as plurality within unity.

---

<sup>40</sup>Waltke takes the view that the overall record focuses on correspondence to God alone as the greater of those to which the plural pronoun refers (primus inter pares) (Old Testament Theology, 215).

<sup>41</sup>Amazingly, Cassuto attributes the Gen 1:2 reference to “the paternal care of the Divine Spirit, which hovered over” the primeval waters at creation (Commentary on the Book of Genesis—Part I, 25). He does not state that the Spirit is a person of the Godhead and, indeed, elsewhere implies that it might be the breath of God by taking the meaning as identical to Job 33:4 (“The spirit of God has made me, and the breath of the Almighty gives me life”; ibid., 24). He makes the non-personal identification more specific in his discussion of 6:3 (“My spirit, the spirit of life that I breathed into man’s nostrils, shall not abide in man forever”; ibid., 296). Hamilton concludes that the text does not indicate a specific viewpoint, therefore, to “translate ‘Spirit’ runs the risk of superimposing trinitarian concepts on Gen. 1 that are not necessarily present” (Genesis Chapters 1–17, 114). See Waltke for an example of a treatment of this issue by a theologian who rejects any association of “the Spirit of God” in the OT with a person of the Godhead (Old Testament Theology, 212–13). Waltke takes references to “the spirit of God/Yahweh” as references to God’s power which he did not reveal as the Holy Spirit (as a divine person) until the coming of Christ (ibid., 619).

<sup>42</sup>Collins, Genesis 1–4, 61.

<sup>43</sup>Cassuto, Commentary on the Book of Genesis—Part I, 55.

<sup>44</sup>Mathews, Genesis 1–11:26, 163.

What we often so blithely dismiss as “foreign to the thought of the OT” may be nothing of the sort.<sup>45</sup>

A closer look at the structure of vv. 26–27 provides some additional information helpful to our understanding of the passage: (single underlining marks singulars; double underlining marks plurals):

- 26 Then God said,
 “Let us make man in our image, according to our likeness;
 and let them rule over the fish of the sea and over the birds of the sky and over the beasts
 and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creeps on the earth.”
- 27 God created man
 in his image,
 in the image of God
he created him;
male and female he created them.

The following table formats the nouns and phrases into their singular and plural forms:

Divine References		Human References
Singular	Plural	Singular	Plural
God said		man
	Let us make		let them rule
	in our image
	our likeness
God created		man
in his image
he created		him
he created			male and female
			them

The text makes three plural statements about God and three about man. Three times “man” appears in the singular. Three times “created” is used in the singular. Three different singular statements are made about God (“God said,” “God created,” “in his image”).<sup>46</sup> In addition, v. 27 is a poetic triplet with the first two cola being formed chiastically.<sup>47</sup>

<sup>45</sup>Hamilton, Genesis Chapters 1–17, 134.

<sup>46</sup>Emphatic triplets characterize the account of the sixth day: Three times “God said” (vv. 24, 26, 29)—the tautology of “God blessed...and said” (v. 28) should be taken as one emphatic declaration of blessing. The blessing itself contains a triplet: “be fruitful...multiply...fill.”

<sup>47</sup>Verse 26 can stand as evidence for the poetic prose (elevated narrative) that makes up much of the Creation account. The insertion of v. 27 as pure poetry will be

Therefore, the text presents the unity and plurality of both God and man. This exegetical result must be taken into account. As Keiser suggests, the “singular and plural terminology provides a strong argument for understanding a connection between the two.”<sup>48</sup> If this account existed as an oral tradition in the post-Fall world, we must assume that the hearers had the mental acuity to think about the parallels here between God and man—especially in light of 2:24 (a man and his wife “become one flesh”). If God only revealed this account at a much later date to Moses, we still must assume (unless we have an anti-Semitic prejudice treating the Jews as dullards and incapable of sound thinking) that this text stimulated the Israelites’ thinking as they contemplated the reasons for such unity, yet plurality, for both God and man. Keiser makes yet another contribution to the analysis of the singular and plural in 1:26–27 when he notes that the transition from singular to plural occurs in a context of generating life.<sup>49</sup>

THEOPHANIES IN GENESIS

“The angel/Angel of Yahweh” (מַלְאָכִי יְהוָה) appears in Genesis 16 (vv. 7, 9–11; cf. 22:11, 15). At times both narrator and speakers within the events identify him with Yahweh (16:13). The angel/messenger can speak in the first person, as though he were God (16:10). Therefore, many commentators and theologians identify this individual as an appearance of God himself, a theophany.<sup>50</sup> Knight lists the following theophanies in Genesis: 16:7–14; 18:1–22; 19; 21:17–19; 22:11–18; 31:11–13; 32:24–30; and, 48:15–16.<sup>51</sup> However, he explains them all away as not being God himself in person, but only an “alter ego’ of himself.”<sup>52</sup> Still, he is forced to admit that a number of these texts specifically identify that presence on earth as God (21:18; 22:14; 31:13). These texts have fallen prey to the same frame of mind that treats Genesis 1 as nothing more than sanctified human imagination. As Moberly points out, theologians have given up on the traditional Christian understanding that the theophany in these chapters indicates a plurality of persons in the Godhead. Why have they given up?—it “naturally fell by the wayside when the text was approached in a historical-critical frame of reference.”<sup>53</sup> matched later by 2:23. Such poetic elements do not negate the essentially historical narrative nature of the creation account.

---

<sup>48</sup>Keiser, “The Divine Plural,” 135.

<sup>49</sup>Ibid., 138. He also associates the transition from singular to plural with the image of God. Since the topic of this paper is more limited, I will not develop this aspect of the text.

<sup>50</sup>Kenneth A. Mathews, Genesis 11:27–50:26, New American Commentary (Nashville: B&H, 2005), 188–89.

<sup>51</sup>Knight, Christian Theology of the Old Testament, 63–65.

<sup>52</sup>Ibid., 67.

<sup>53</sup>R. W. L. Moberly, The Theology of the Book of Genesis, Old Testament Theology,

Genesis 16:7–14

In this passage the narrator (Moses) himself (not Hagar) identifies the angel of Yahweh as Yahweh (“Then she called the name of Yahweh who spoke to her”; v. 13). According to Wenham, the text’s referent involves “God himself appearing in human form.”<sup>54</sup> However, Waltke takes the angel as merely a surrogate for God who is treated as God, but remains distinct from God—he is but a messenger whom God sends out of the heavenly council of angelic beings.<sup>55</sup> Waltke ignores the statement “Yahweh who spoke to her” (יְהוָה הַדֹּבֵר אֵלֶיהָ, v. 13). It seems clear by context that Hagar is addressing “the angel of Yahweh” who had just been speaking to her (vv. 11–12). Merrill also identifies “the angel of Yahweh” as a surrogate, rather than being a person of the Godhead.<sup>56</sup>

Genesis 18–19

The opening words of this text unit (“Yahweh appeared to him at the oaks of Mamre,” 18:1) point to Moses’s narration of the events in these two chapters. Abraham himself did not at first realize that one of the three men at his tent door was actually Yahweh.<sup>57</sup> Wenham observes that when “the angel of Yahweh” appears together with other individuals, at first “they are usually taken to be men, but by the end of the encounter one of them is realized to be God (18:2, 22; Judg 6:11–22; 13:3–22).”<sup>58</sup> Even if one were to identify the description of the three individuals (two angels plus a person of the Godhead) as anthropomorphism, that does not require that the entire narrative, together with the identification of the three individuals, “be dismissed as merely figurative or symbolic.”<sup>59</sup> Those who accept the occurrence of a theophany here do so, in at least some cases, even if they deny that a theophany oc-

---

ed. Brent A. Strawn and Patrick D. Miller (2009; repr., Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2013), 223, n. 37.

<sup>54</sup>Wenham, Genesis 16–50, 9.

<sup>55</sup>Waltke, Genesis, 254.

<sup>56</sup>Merrill refers to 18:1 as a reference to “the Lord’s appearance...in a tangible form in the person of the angel of the Lord who, in fact, is equated with the Lord himself (Gen. 18:10, 13, 17, 20, etc.)” (Everlasting Dominion, 77). But, a few pages later states that this personage “appears, either as a representative of the Lord or, in a few instances, as his surrogate” (ibid., 80–81). He reasons that there is no basis in the OT for taking this individual as the preincarnate Christ, but he is merely “a superhuman spokesman for the Lord himself” (ibid., 81; see also 83–84).

<sup>57</sup>Wenham, Genesis 16–50, 45.

<sup>58</sup>Ibid., 9.

<sup>59</sup>Hoekema, Created in God’s Image, 127. Hoekema’s argument for the integrity of the narrative seeks to respond to those, unlike himself, who think that the author identified the individuals using a mere anthropomorphism, rather than intending that they actually possessed the physical forms of men.

curred in chapter 16.<sup>60</sup>

In addition to the theophany that seems so apparent in chapter 18, 19:24 says, “Then Yahweh rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah sulphurous fire from Yahweh, from the heavens.” By placing “Yahweh” at the head of the clause, the Spirit-superintended author emphasizes the Lord’s role in the event. As Ross puts it, “The text...simply emphasizes that, whatever means were used, it was the Lord who rained this judgment on them.”<sup>61</sup> While this is an accurate observation, it is only one part of the overall meaning of this clause. There is a second occurrence of “Yahweh” later in the verse: “from Yahweh.” Is the second mention of Yahweh merely a redundant expression in order to extend the emphasis of the first word, or is it the result of Moses’s careful attention to theological detail?<sup>62</sup>

The REB, NLT, and NJB choose to eliminate the second reference to Yahweh as a redundant expression. In his commentary Wenham opts for a similar conclusion but for different reasons. He believes that the “narrator stresses that ‘it was from the LORD.’” However, Wenham translates the verse as follows: “and the LORD rained brimstone and fire on Sodom and Gomorrah: it was from the LORD from the sky.”<sup>63</sup> This represents a legitimate attempt to translate the text as it stands. It also takes into account the Masoretic accents dividing the verse. However, the treatment of this final portion of the verse as a noun clause (viz., “it was”) lacks convincing grammatical evidence. Instead, it would be more natural grammatically to take these last two phrases as adverbial prepositional phrases modifying the main verb, “rained.”

Most translations obscure the presence of two different persons of the Godhead. If the expression were an intentional redundancy, one would expect to see it used elsewhere in the OT. However, it does not occur elsewhere. This is a unique expression that is clarified by later revelation. The OT reveals that in a number of cases the “angel of Yahweh” was the immediate agent of judgment (cf. 2 Sam 24:16–17; 2 Kgs 19:35; Ps 35:6–7). Therefore, it is no surprise that the same agency might apply in the judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah.

Genesis 19:24 strikes at the heart of aberrant theology found in some cults like the Jehovah’s Witnesses. This verse identifies two persons with the title of Yahweh—one in heaven above and one with a presence nearer to or upon the earth. In his Systematic Theology Strong places this text alongside Hosea 1:7 and 2 Timothy 1:18 as examples of passages in which “Jehovah distinguishes himself from Jehovah.”<sup>64</sup>

---

<sup>60</sup>Waltke (Genesis, 266) is just such an example.

<sup>61</sup>Allen P. Ross, Creation and Blessing: A Guide to the Study and Exposition of Genesis (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1996), 362.

<sup>62</sup>See my study of this passage: William D. Barrick, “The Integration of OT Theology with Bible Translation,” Master’s Seminary Journal 12 (Spring 2001): 26–29.

<sup>63</sup>Wenham, Genesis 16–50, 35.

<sup>64</sup>Augustus Hopkins Strong, Systematic Theology: A Compendium Designed for the

Likewise, Borland points to the same distinction of persons in Genesis 19:24.<sup>65</sup> In his commentary Hamilton argues that the phraseology is not to be “dismissed as a doublet or a gloss.”<sup>66</sup> However, he stops short of noting any distinction between divine persons in the passage.<sup>67</sup>

Were the translators of the REB, NLT, and NJB anti-Trinitarian? If so, that cannot be determined by the translation alone. A theologically insensitive translation does not reveal anything about the theological position of the translators. The translation might indicate that a particular theological conclusion was not sufficiently clear to the translators in a particular passage. It is irresponsible to stigmatize the translators with a particular theological error or heresy on the basis of a single passage’s translation. Do such translations weaken the evidence supporting a particular doctrine? They might, but that is not the same as outright denial of the doctrine in question. Even though prejudice may be implied by a particular translation, that one translation rarely affects the readers’ broad conclusions about doctrine when they study a particular theological point through the entire version in which the one translation appears. One questionable translation in one passage might mislead someone on a few occasions, but in almost every case the same reader

---

Use of Theological Students, 3 vols. in 1 (1907; repr., Valley Forge, PA: Judson, 1967), 318.

<sup>65</sup>James A. Borland, Christ in the Old Testament, rev. ed. (Ross-shire, UK: Christian Focus, 1999), 152. Others who note this same distinction in the text include David L. Cooper, The God of Israel, rev. ed. (Los Angeles: Biblical Research Society, 1945), 23. Oehler granted that some sort of distinction was being made in Gen 19:24 but did not think that, in and of itself, it supported the view of identifying the one manifestation directly with the Logos, the Son of God, the second person of the Godhead (Gustav Friedrich Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament, trans. George E. Day [1883; repr., Minneapolis, MN: Klock & Klock, 1978], 133). Herman Bavinck cites Gen 19:24 as important OT passages indicating “a distinction within the Divine Being” (The Doctrine of God, trans. and ed. William Hendriksen [1977; repr., Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1997], 258).

<sup>66</sup>Victor P. Hamilton, Genesis Chapters 18–50, New International Commentary on the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995), 46. Westermann is representative of those who think that the repetitive reference to Yahweh is awkward and due to a merging of two different accounts (Claus Westermann, Genesis 12–36: A Commentary, trans. John J. Scullion, Continental Commentary [Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1985], 306).

<sup>67</sup>In a recent article Michael S. Heiser examines biblical and ANE concepts regarding a two powers (divine council co-regency) and/or double presence view (esp. in Ugaritic literature). Heiser suggests that this viewpoint could be the means by which some early Jewish interpreters dealt with seemingly dual Yahwehs, the angel of Yahweh, and plural divine pronouns in the Hebrew Bible (“Co-Regency in Ancient Israel’s Divine Council,” Bulletin of Biblical Research 26 [2016]: 195–225). While his study is interesting, Heiser fails to mention or discuss at least two very basic realities: (1) that the worldview of the biblical writers, as true believers, was not the worldview of unbelieving ANE writers and peoples, and (2) that any potential similarity between a skewed ANE concept of plurality of expressions by or through one deity and the biblical concept of plurality of persons in the Godhead only demonstrates how the original divine truth has been altered by unbelieving mankind living within a culture antagonistic to the true God and to his spoken revelation.

can formulate a theological opinion from the full version that generally results in sound doctrine.

Genesis 21:17–19

This passage does not exhibit the same clarity as the previous two passages. First of all, “the angel of God” (v. 17) occurs, not “the angel of Yahweh.”<sup>68</sup> Secondly, the angel states that “God has heard the voice of the lad” (v. 17). Thirdly, v. 19 indicates that “God opened her eyes,” but does not require that he be present. Wenham points out the similarities with 22:11, 15 to indicate that the two personages were probably identical—neither descended to earth.<sup>69</sup> The ambiguity makes it difficult to categorize this event as a clear theophany—there is no seeing or appearing, only speaking and hearing. Waltke’s brief summary indicates the same view he had taken on chapter 16 (though he only refers to 22:1, 15—and there he does refer back to 16:7).<sup>70</sup>

Genesis 22:11–18

Representing one view of this text, Wenham assumes a theophany here on the basis of the phraseology employed and the use of  $\text{הָאֱלֹהִים}$  in the name of the mountain (Moriah). The verb characterizes prior appearances of God to Abraham (12:7; 17:1; 18:1), linking the Moriah event to Abraham’s past experiences.<sup>71</sup>

Genesis 31:11–13

Again “the angel of God” occurs in place of “the Angel of Yahweh” (see 21:17; 28:12; 32:2). Waltke implies by his reference back to 16:7 that he takes this appearance as a surrogate for God, not God himself.<sup>72</sup> However, that view seems to ignore the self-identifying announcement of v. 13, “I am the God of Bethel” ( $\text{אֲנִי הָאֱלֹהִים בֵּית-אֵל}$ ).

Genesis 32:24–30 (Heb. 25–31)

The mysterious nature of the account regarding Jacob and his wrestling opponent at the Jabbok River has spawned many different explanations. For those steeped in the evolution of natural religion and a denial of divine inspiration and biblical inerrancy, the explanations run the full gamut of conformity to the worldviews of pagan religions found

---

<sup>68</sup>Waltke, Genesis, 296. He suggests that the phrase use of “the angel of God” (as opposed to “the angel of Yahweh”) resulted from the fact that the angel is addressing the non-elect here.

<sup>69</sup>Wenham, Genesis 16–50, 85.

<sup>70</sup>Waltke, Genesis, 296, 308.

<sup>71</sup>Wenham, Genesis 16–50, 111.

<sup>72</sup>Waltke, Genesis, 296, 425.

in Israel's historical and cultural context. Wenham summarizes such views as follows,

Gunkel, von Rad, and Westermann are among those who suggest that originally this was an account of Jacob's encounter with a Canaanite river god. And this they hold is confirmed by the "man's" desire to depart before dawn, a regular feature of folk tale. However, as Eissfeldt (KS 3, 412–16) observed, the story actually identifies the opponent as El the supreme Canaanite creator god.<sup>73</sup>

Verse 28 (Heb. 29, "for you have struggled with God," כִּי־שָׁרִיתָ) implies that the individual with whom Jacob had wrestled was God himself. Jacob then confirms this fact by saying, "I have seen God face to face"<sup>74</sup> (v. 30, Heb. 31, רָאִיתִי אֱלֹהִים פְּנִים אֶל־פְּנִים). The Lord had appeared to Jacob, as he had to Abraham (Gen 18:1–2), in the physical form of a man.<sup>75</sup> Although he does not spend much time discussing the theophanies in Genesis, Brueggemann does finally indicate that the "angel" appearances in chapters 18 and 32 did indeed involve God just as certainly as 48:15–16.<sup>76</sup>

Genesis 48:15–16

On the one hand, Knight includes this text as a potential theophany solely on the basis of implications gained from later revelation in Isaiah that indicate that God alone acts as the Redeemer of Israel (e.g., Isa 43:14; 44:6, 24; 47:4).<sup>77</sup> On the other hand, Wenham relies upon prior textual references and repetitions within the current passage to establish the identity of "the angel who has redeemed" Jacob.<sup>78</sup> First, God himself had rescued Jacob from both his uncle (Gen 31:42) and his brother (Gen 32–33). Second, Jacob's triple declaration parallels and equates God with the angel:

The God before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac walked,
The God who has been my shepherd all my life to this day,
The angel who has redeemed me from all evil (48:15–16a, emphasis mine)<sup>79</sup>

<sup>73</sup>Wenham, Genesis 16–50, 295.

<sup>74</sup>Waltke notes that "face to face" appears in the Hebrew Bible "only of direct divine-human encounters, not necessarily of literal visual perception" (Genesis, 447).

<sup>75</sup>See Hoekema, Created in God's Image, 127, regarding the possible use of anthropomorphism.

<sup>76</sup>Brueggemann, Genesis, 362.

<sup>77</sup>Knight, Christian Theology of the Old Testament, 64–65.

<sup>78</sup>Wenham, Genesis 16–50, 465.

<sup>79</sup>Waltke takes the parallelism as a strong indicator that, unlike 16:7, the angel is God himself (Genesis, 599). Brueggemann notes the same three parallels and adds a fourth: "God make you" (v. 2) (Genesis, 361). He emphasizes that this God is the focus of the text and all the verbs describe his actions (ibid., 362). For a view concluding the Third, Jacob calls upon this individual (identified by the triple statement) to bless Ephraim and Manasseh, Joseph's two sons (v. 16b).<sup>80</sup>

Summary Regarding Theophany in Genesis

Such theophanies seem to possess one significant feature: all of them “reveal, at least in a partial manner, something about [God] Himself, or his will, to the recipient.”<sup>81</sup> Should we identify the divine person in such appearances as the pre-incarnate Son of God (i.e., a Christophany)? James Borland defines “Christophany” as “those unsought, intermittent and temporary, visible and audible manifestations of God the Son in human form, by which God communicated something to certain conscious human beings on earth prior to the birth of Jesus Christ.”<sup>82</sup> When the biblical account associates “the angel of Yahweh” with a theophany, “messenger” might be a better translation than “angel,” because this title denotes the function or office of the individual, not his nature.<sup>83</sup> In addition, he is spoken of as actually being God, he bears the name Yahweh, he speaks as God, and he displays divine attributes and authority. Most significantly, however, he receives worship.<sup>84</sup>

Shedd identifies twelve actions and relations that serve as evidence to distinguish between persons of the Godhead.<sup>85</sup> One of the twelve Shedd identifies involves the persons of the Godhead conferring with one another as in Genesis 1:26 and 11:7. Genesis 1:1–2 also potentially depicts two divine persons working together at the creation of the heavens and the earth. Among the Genesis texts describing theophanies, 19:24 describes one Yahweh residing in heaven working in concert with the theophanic Yahweh upon the earth to bring judgment upon Sodom and Gomorrah. Thus, three different evidences in Genesis point to a distinction of divine persons. Then there is the example of one person of the Godhead speaking about another, as in 6:3, “Then Yahweh said, ‘My Spirit shall not strive with mankind forever.’” existence of two persons, but the second subordinate to the first, see Heiser, “Co-Regency in Ancient Israel’s Divine Council,” 218–19.

---

<sup>80</sup>Jacob’s request (“Bless”) consists of a jussive 3ms (בִּרְכֵנִי), not a plural, which might be expected if God and the angel were two separate beings.

<sup>81</sup>Borland, Christ in the Old Testament, 24.

<sup>82</sup>Ibid., 17.

<sup>83</sup>Ibid., 36.

<sup>84</sup>Ibid., 37–42.

<sup>85</sup>W. G. T. Shedd writes, “One divine Person loves another, John 3:35; dwells in another, John 14:10, 11; suffers from another, Zach. [sic] 13:7; knows another, Matt. 11:27; addresses another, Heb. 1:8; is the way to another, John 14:6; speaks of another, Luke 3:22; glorifies another, John 17:5; confers with another, Gen. 1:26, 11:7; plans with another, Isa. 9:6; sends another, Gen. 16:7, John 14:26; rewards another, Phil. 2:5–11; Heb. 2:9” (Dogmatic Theology, 2nd ed., 2 vols. [New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1889], 1:279).

Putting all of these Genesis references together, we can reach a conclusion similar to that of Oehler: “Though we must not read the New Testament doctrine of the Trinity into the Old Testament, it is yet undeniable that we find the way to the economic Trinity of the New Testament already prepared in the doctrine of the Malakh and of the Spirit.”<sup>86</sup>

CONCLUSION

This study of the Trinity in the book of Genesis has produced for our consideration the following findings:

- (1) A suggestion that there might be a plurality of persons in the Godhead appears almost immediately in the text with Genesis 1:1 referring to God and v. 2 referring to “the Spirit of God.”
- (2) The plurality gains a stronger indicator by the three passages in which the first person plural pronouns occur (1:26; 3:22; 11:7).
- (3) When 6:3 depicts one person of the Godhead speaking about another, the evidence continues to grow.
- (4) Then 19:24 describes two Yahwehs working together from two different locations in the judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah. That presents an increasingly convincing amount of evidence for the plurality of divine persons in the book of Genesis.
- (5) Lastly, the theophanies of chapters 16, 18–19, 21, 22, 31, 32, and 48, which include “the angel/messenger of Yahweh,” strengthen the evidence with their overwhelming testimony to three potential candidates for divine persons: (1) God/Yahweh #1, (2) the Angel/Yahweh #2, and (3) the Spirit of God #3.

No one should interpret these evidences as a clear declaration of the Trinity in the same terms with which the NT does. However, the book of Genesis provides significant information regarding a plurality of persons in the Godhead at work on earth and with mankind in the pre-patriarchal and patriarchal periods.

---

<sup>86</sup>Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament, 142.